Excusing Aggression Does Not a Libertarian Make

"Well mostly I want people to be free, and mostly I want government leaving people alone, but in this case, for the good of society, I think it's necessary for government aggression to be widely used, because the alternative is too scary!"

If you say that to justify "government" welfare, you're a statist.

If you say that to justify "gun control," you're a statist.

If you say that to justify a "government" military, you're a statist.

If you say that to justify "public" schools, you're a statist.

If you say that to justify the "war on drugs," you're a statist.

If you say that to justify "closed borders," you're a statist.

In short, if you say that for any reason, you're a statist.

Which excuse you use-which thing scared you into condoning widespread authoritarian aggression-is pretty damn irrelevant. If all politicians have to do, in order to make you so afraid that you condone authoritarian power, is run down a list of scary things (real or imagined) until they get to one you're afraid of, then: 1) you are a statist, and; 2) you will end up empowering malicious political parasites.