

Instant or Nothing?

I know a free society isn't going to be instant.

"Taxation" isn't going to be abolished today.

All anti-gun "laws" aren't going to be eliminated today.

Violations of life, liberty, and property, committed by organized gangs of archators who call themselves "government" will continue.

But that realization is no reason to do things in support of these violations. It's not "pragmatic;" it's back-stabbing.

I really don't understand those willing to act as though these acts of statism are "legitimate" just because they aren't going away today. Cancer won't be cured today, either, but that's no reason to pretend it's good or necessary.
