

Life Outside the Cloister

Every time a person asks how homeschoolers learn about relationships or socialization, I think that some folks must believe a) that homeschooled kids must be stuck in the home all day, since their own experience is with being stuck in a cloister, and b) they must not realize that lots of life actually happens outside that tiny cloister in which they spent most of their early lives.

There are actually real people doing things – including relating and socializing – during regular cloister hours.

Really. Amazing. Absolutely crazy how varied and interesting life outside the cloister is.
