

On GMO Labeling

No, the government should not require that Monsanto or anybody else label for genetically-modified ingredients. But more, they also should not protect corporate decision-makers from civil suits for mislabeling their products. A genetically-modified carrot is no longer a carrot. When a company that uses modified ingredients calls them their unmodified versions, they are committing fraud. We don't need forced labeling. We need corporate decision-making liability. And that's today's two cents.

Skyler.