Re: Nature of Evil II

Nobody asked but …

Across every linden tree I have ever seen, there are no two leaves alike when the fall color begins to blush. Each leaf is a product of where and when it came into the world, it’s birth, and a product of where and how it spent the growing season, it’s world. No autumnal aspect is predictable. The same applies to evil. We can know it when we see it, but we cannot see it coming or going. A satan may exist, but that does not imply that we can see his manifestation among mortals. This is why psychological analysis and the NSA cannot predict where school tragedies and terrorist events will arise, no matter how many dollars or how much political capital are thrown at evil.
