

I Wish You Nothing But Freedom

Written by T.K. Coleman.

Whoever and wherever you are, I wish you nothing but freedom.

The things you believe, say, and do, even if they annoy me or make me uncomfortable, will never ever extinguish the fire within me that burns for the freedom of all (including yours).

My desire for the liberation of all individuals won't be compromised by personal vendettas nor will it be weakened by the sometimes irritating actions of people on the left, people on the right, people in the libertarian world, or people who couldn't care less about those kinds of labels.

I am not a proponent of freedom because my life happens to be going really well right now. I am not a proponent of freedom because freedom is where the money is. I am not a proponent of freedom because everyone likes me. I am not a proponent of freedom in order to get back at someone I dislike.

I am not a proponent of freedom as a reaction to current events or recent political debates. I am not a proponent of freedom because of what some celebrity randomly happens to believe this week. I am not a proponent of freedom because I think freedom is edgy, trendy, and provocative.

I am a proponent of freedom because freedom is life. I am a proponent of freedom because without a deep and abiding respect for freedom there's no sense in being a proponent for anything else.

So whoever and wherever you are, I wish you nothing but freedom.

Be free in whatever way you know how to be. And if there's anything I can do to encourage your journey, don't hesitate to let me know.

Originally published at TKColeman.com.