

How I Intend to Educate My Children

Editor's Pick. Written by Connor Boyack.

Because I've written several books along with hundreds of articles, op-eds, and other material all dealing with politics, economics, history, and religion, people often assume that my educational background deals with these subjects.

The truth is quite different—I strongly disliked, and performed poorly in, these types of courses in school. I didn't write well at all, and couldn't stand English class. I majored in Information Technology and became a web developer. I often wished I could have been spared my "general education" coursework and be allowed to focus on the subjects that I found interesting and worthwhile.

Upon graduating from college I had massive amounts of free time on my hands. There was no more homework, no more assignments, no more summer classes, no more reading requirements. I was liberated! No longer required to think about and invest my energy in issues other people deemed important, I began to spend time thinking about issues that I wanted to learn more about and better understand.

Read the full thing at ConnorBoyack.com »