

Not My President

Nobody asked but ...

I'm sharing with you a link to an article I read Thursday morning. I can't believe it has taken this long to simplify, to map the current political landscape. Maybe it hasn't, maybe I have been negligent, maybe this is old hat.

Those who really care have left the building, they just haven't abandoned the panacea — voting — yet. They haven't put 2 and 2 together. The political madhouse has been taken over by the country club set and the crackers and cheese set. How else could a reality show host and a wild-eyed old man from Vermont have stolen the march?

Read the linked article. It's not exactly deathless prose, but it contains a large helping of the truth about how we continue to live in the past.
