

On Critical Race Theory

As if I needed another reason to keep my children out of government schools, Critical Race Theory seems to be creeping up everywhere. I could be wrong, but everything I've seen and read about Critical Race Theory (and Woke-ism) leads me to believe that at it is fundamentally about making so-called "White" people feel ashamed of the color of their skin. Yes, I think that's right. Imagine a program designed to make Black people feel ashamed of the color of their skin... perhaps a program that disapprovingly highlights crimes and vices committed by Black people and aimed primarily at making Black people, adults and children, view their skin color as a major contributing factor to these very bad behaviors and their devastating consequences on society. Wouldn't we reasonable, and rightly, categorize such a program as racist? Judging people or making them feel ashamed due to either their skin color or genetic ancestry is one of the primary weapons of White Supremacists. Those espousing Critical Race Theory are essentially conceding to White Supremacists the superiority of their emphasis on "race" and what it says about individuals. Disgusting, if you ask me, and that's today's two cents.
