

Placing The Solutions Off-Limits

“How can we solve this or that problem? Oh, and you’re not allowed to change anything that matters! That would be crazy!”

How often do you see this kind of thing from statisticians? All the time? I do.

They’ll ask how “we” can end government corruption, but only without ending political government.

How “we” can fix education, but only without ending government schooling.

How “we” can solve crime, without eliminating anti-defense legislation or ending prohibition.

How can “we” end police brutality without abolishing the police?

The solutions are obvious, but off-limits.

They don’t want a solution; they want a pat on the head for being so concerned about the issue.
