

Statists Hate Free Will

Written by Jacob Hornberger for FFF.org.

Sometimes the cashier at the grocery store asks people whether they would like to donate one dollar to some charity. Most of the people I've seen say no. Whenever that happens, I think to myself how statisticians must be grinding their teeth in anger and rage when they hear that. If it were up to them, the state would enact a law requiring everyone to donate that one dollar.

How can I be so sure about that? Because that's the entire foundation of the welfare state that statisticians have foisted upon our nation. Statisticians hate the idea of people being free to say "no" when it comes to charity. So, they've erected an enormous system that coerces people into making charitable contributions.

Read the full thing »