

The Moment of a Global, Grassroots Struggle for Freedom

The “democratic” regimes of this world no longer have any resistance to moving from “flattening the curve” over a two-week period to introducing martial law, imposing an indefinite “sanitary” passport and mass blocking bank accounts.

Hence, all people of good will should not have any resistance to move from individual protest to mass support for or organization of “freedom convoys” and similar forms of consistent, methodical opposition capable of paralyzing state functioning and effectively forcing them to act in a shorter period of time, and then ultimately surrendering.

Freedom theorists have long emphasized that the steadily progressing wave of “soft totalitarianism” can only be undone by means of spontaneous and grassroots opposition, as well as relentless and global opposition. It seems that the moment has finally come when the world has enough knowledge, will, and determination to actually express such an objection – so one must act, according to individual possibilities, with thought, speech, deed, or care so that it does not burn out before achieving all of your goals.