

Why I (Still) Blog

The liberty-lover family is facing tough times. We will make it through; we always have throughout history. But the near future will probably be hard and not all of us will make it to the better times beyond that.

I write my blog to try to give you ideas, encouragement, inspiration and whatever else might help you survive and thrive while living surrounded by rabid statism. So that, perhaps, you can increase your chances to make it through, and enjoy the circumstances as much as possible until times get better. I hope it helps.

Obviously not everyone will “get” my blog. Only a tiny slice of modern humanity could get it, even if they knew about it. Most are simply too entrenched in set ways of thinking to understand anything outside of their toxic little box. Some probably just don’t like me, and would reject anything I say on that basis alone. It happens.

I appreciate you for not being like that.

I’ll continue to stick my neck out, knowing you- The Remnant— are out there. Just as long as I can, as long as I still have something to say, and as long as I still feel I am doing some good.

I’ve also got to remember to do my best to balance no-holds-barred truth with compassion and being nice. And, for me, that’s not easy. Statism drains me, exhausts me, makes me tired and short tempered, and I have an almost overpowering urge to mock statist of any degree. It’s a struggle.
